Abolish Church Fees.
Complaints are again made that fees are collected by priests in New York and Brooklyn from worshippers for hearing masses. The excuse given here by the clergy and their friends is that such fees are necessary for the proper maintenance of the churches and that the entire burden should not be put upon those who generously contributed their money to erect the houses of worship originally, but should be borne by all who receive benefits therefrom. In 1866 the Literary Council of Baltimore [see p. 1] held with the approval of the Holy See and in conformity with a decree of Pius IX., declared that the habit of requiring money at the doors of churches that the faithful may enter and be present at the divine mysteries was abusive and should be abrogated. And the Council ordered that such offensive habit should cease. But it has not ceased, at least in spirit. For upon entering the faithful are met by collectors, who, with extended basket or plate, receive what are supposed to be the voluntary offerings of the people, but which are in reality a tax levied. Every one who enters is expected to pay something, and is not welcomed or wanted unless he or she does pay. But even this apparently innocent custom has been condemned at Rome, where the Sacred Congregation ordered that "neither outside nor inside of churches should any kind of demand be made on the faithful for the sacraments, nor for the celebration of the Holy Sacrifice." A plea is now put forward by the offenders against this rule that inasmuch as their edifices have not been consecrated (as they cannot be while they remain mortgaged) they are not therefore churches in the sense in which the Sacred Congregation and the Pope understood the term, and hence it is lawful and right to charge the faithful a fee for the privilege of worshipping there. While the letter of the law may be obeyed, if spirit is violated. The worshipper who pays as he enters, or who puts in the basket his supposed voluntary offering, receives a ticket which entitles him to a seat while he waits for the service to begin, and while he is not excluded from the house, he is allowed to find standing room in some corner. This exaction of money from worshippers is said to be caused by the great debts in so many churches in these two cities, where young priests fresh from the seminary are appointed to new parishes whose people are poor, and who think the dignity of the Church and the parish requires a church building that cost not less than $300,000 when a $10,000 one would better suit the ability of the people who have to supply the money. The extravagance in building, with the consequent begging imposed upon the clergy, has thoroughly secularized many of them and ruined not a few.—Y. Y. Herald.

Fighting at a Grave.
Frank Donaway, a Millsboro small boy, was seen by Mr. Barker, a village grave digger, and leaping from a grave that he was digging Barker roused the lad. Donaway, etc., attracted by the boy's cries, appeared upon the scene. After a short, but very eloquent parley, in which Barker said he could assimilate Donaway, and Donaway remarked that he was equally confident he could jam Barker into an unrecognizable mass, Barker sprang out of the grave and seizing a shovel attempted to brain Donaway. Dugging, Donaway grasped Barker firmly by his side whiskers and shook him like a rat, varying the monotony of the occasion by hitting him in the face and choking him, and finally ending by thrusting him back into the grave with the intention of burying him alive. Barker prayed so piously, however, that Donaway allowed him to crawl out, more dead than alive. As Barker fled out of the cemetery, closely followed by Donaway and son, he remarked to the former: "I thought that grave was dug for Peter Barker's child, but I guess you want it for me." "Shut up," said Donaway. "I won't," said Barker, at the same time dabbing at Donaway with his spade. The blow was wasted off and the spade buried fifty feet away. Barker then picked up an iron coupling bolt that happened to be lying over him and attempted to strike Donaway on the head with it. Again he was frustrated and further hostilities were stopped.—Wilmington (Del.) News.
